Welcome to Taylor, Texas

Taylor represents the best of Texas. Located just 30 miles northeast of Austin and surrounded by corn and cotton fields, Taylor has been the prairie, the railroad town, the idyllic country community and now the progressive edge of an urban landscape. Home to a community of more than 18,000, Taylor lies in the heart of the community, in the richness of its history, and in the pride of its heritage.

The progress and promise of Taylor is most evident in its newest additions: the new Taylor Public Library, the The Sustainable Technology Academy that provides training and industry support for emerging "green" technology companies, the tournament-grade Taylor Regional Park and Sports Complex and the East Williamson County Higher Education Center, a multi-institutional teaching center that boasts a partnership of Temple College, Texas State Technical College, Texas Tech, Concordia College and Legacy Early College High School.

Taylor EDC

History

- In 1993 the Economic Development (ED) Committee of the Taylor Chamber began to explore ways to encourage business growth in Taylor. Surrounding communities, Round Rock and Georgetown, were funding ED activities with money from their general fund.
- The Chamber Board approved the recommendation of its executive director to consider the sales tax for economic development as a possible method. In August 1993, City Commissioners agreed to place the issue on the November ballot.
- The City Commission decided to combine the ½ cent for property tax reduction with the ½ cent for ED sales tax.
- Of those who voted, 72.4% voted for the proposition to create a 4A corporation and 27.6% voted against it.
- The primary source of funds is the 4A sales tax which can be used to assist primary businesses, infrastructure for businesses, and workforce development.
- By January 1995, the Taylor EDC had acquired office space, hired a staff and was well on its way.
